Approximately 80% of certain U.S. mortgages contained Lender Fraud in one degree or another. After U.S. House sales prices peaked in early 2006 and began their steep decline refinancing became more difficult. Adjustable-rate mortgages began to reset at higher interest rates, those and other mortgage delinquencies soared. Securities backed with mortgages riddled with lender fraud, not limited to sub-prime mortgages widely held by financial firms, lost their value.

Fraud for Profit

A complex scheme involving multiple parties including mortgage lending professionals in a financially motivated attempt to defraud the lender out of large sums of money while robbing consumers out of their right of homeownership.

Today it is commonly known that these servicing companies are driven by higher profit margins to continue to collect monthly mortgage payments even if only partial payments from homeowners whom other wise would not make any payments if they knew that their servicer was either not able to offer meaningful long term solutions or the resolution a servicer may make available would be either unacceptable or unsustainable to the homeowner.
