Help Morgan Drexen stand up to unconstitutional government intrusion!

Morgan Drexen Integrated Systems, a company of fewer than 300 employees, is locked in a legal battle with the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. Morgan Drexen is fighting back against the bully tactics of a bloated agency that answers to no one, writes its own rules, and spends more than half a billion dollars of taxpayer money annually without having to justify a single penny.

In July, 2013, Morgan Drexen filed suit against the CFPB, challenging the agency's constitutionality. The CFPB responded with a retaliatory lawsuit a few weeks later. The legal costs associated with challenging a massive federal agency are astronomical, particularly for a relatively small company like Morgan Drexen.

The CFPB has demanded that Morgan Drexen, a provider of software and back-office support services to attorneys, produce confidential bankruptcy documents of thousands of consumers, communications that are protected by attorney-client privilege. Already under fire from Congress for its egregious data mining campaign, it was recently revealed that the CFPB may have illegally recruited the U.S. Trustee Program to obtain bankruptcy documents through the "side door." The Government Accountability Office has launched an investigation into the CFPB's data-mining program.

Bully tactics aside, Morgan Drexen asserts the CFPB is an unconstitutional agency. As the initial lawsuit contends: "Plaintiffs challenge the structure of CFPB as violating the Constitution's separation of powers given: (1) the extraordinary scope of power delegated to CFPB; and (2) the lack of political oversight and necessary checks and balances. In a very real sense, CFPB's authority extends into virtually every boardroom and living room in America."

It is not hyperbole to suggest this is a David vs. Goliath battle.
